“(De)cyphering Mestizaje, Encrypting Lived Faith”
Dr. Néstor Medina

Abstract

My role is to talk about the multivalent category of mestizaje in Latina/o theology. For starters and for the purpose of this presentation, mestizaje carries simultaneously the following meanings: One, the biological intermixture that took place between indigenous communities and Spanish peoples as a result of the Spanish invasion and subsequent colonial societies that started at the end of the 15th century. Two, the historical double condition of cultural intermixture: on one hand, the realization that our cultural traditions stem from multiple cultural sources: Spanish, Indigenous, African, and Anglo, and growing. And on the other hand, the unmasking of the cultural assimilationist and colonizing social and religious structures that discriminate against Latinas/os in the US.

Mestizaje then operates as the key for unlocking the richness of the Latina/o experiences of faith in God. With all its real and perceived limitations, the condition, notion, and category of mestizaje, I would argue, marks the point of intersection between Latina/o theology’s dual act of deciphering and recodifying: Deciphering—in the sense of unraveling and unmasking the intersection of oppression and exclusion based on culture and racialization of peoples. Encrypting—in the sense of re-codifying the lived faith of Latina/o communities. In other words, Mestizaje is a cipher that encompasses the complex set of intersecting forces (positive and negative) that constitute Latina/o communities, and which serve as reservoir of theological meaning.
