This is the first volume in a new series on Global Competition Law and Economics by Stanford University Press. The initial volume builds on the twenty-fifth anniversary of the publication of Frank Easterbrook’s influential article The Limits of Antitrust in the Texas Law Review. While only a few of the fourteen authors explore the specific limits discussed by Professor (now Judge) Easterbrook, the different essays engage in a broader discussion of economic, substantive, procedural, institutional, and cultural limits to the effective enforcement of competition law. The editors have assembled a first-rate team of contributors from North America, Europe, Asia, and Latin America. As a result, there is a welcome multiplicity of views and styles on the theme of the collection. All the pieces are enjoyable and many are memorable. This is a terrific start to a most worthy project of publishing rigorous and important scholarship on comparative competition law.
