PROGRAM DESCRIPTION:

This intensive two-week course explores how public relations is defined and practiced in an era of globalization. As more companies become multinational and as public issues grow worldwide in focus, communication professionals work in an increasingly interconnected world. Students will learn how to navigate this new landscape through classes, discussion of real-world cases, guest speakers and field trips to communication agencies, corporations, cultural institutions and nonprofit organizations. The course helps prepare students for careers in public relations and advertising, communication, marketing, business, international studies and related fields. London is the perfect setting for the course because it is home to the European headquarters of one third of the world's largest companies and an international public relations hub.
