This particular section of Theo 185 -- an ethics core course - will introduce students to basic methods & sources of Christian ethics and apply them to key ethical issues facing us in the present day, e.g: Consumerism; Structural Racism; Climate Change; Socio-Economic & Racial-Ethnic Inequalities in U.S. Health & Healthcare. Students will be introduced to central Christian theo-ethical concepts such as: respect for persons, virtue ethics, natural law, liberation theology and solidarity. Students will get an initial sense of the varied (& sometimes conflicting) ways in which Christians draw upon their faith tradition for ethical guidance. We will consider both Protestant and Roman Catholic thinkers, but the greater emphasis is on the Roman Catholic tradition. All/No Religious Backgrounds Welcome! Professing a Christian faith is not a requirement of this class, nor will it earn you extra points. If you were raised (or participate) in another religious tradition, or no religious tradition at all, your insights are absolutely welcome! Sometimes a view from outside a tradition can see more clearly than a view from inside it.

This section of THEO 186 will explore different religious ethical approaches in Christianity, Judaism, and Islam. To focus our inquiry, we will look specifically at sexuality, gender, and reproductive ethics. We will notice that there are differences not just between but within these traditions, in terms of how they "do" religious ethics, the authorities to which they turn, and the positions they take. In other words, there are many different Jewish, Christian and Muslim perspectives on sex, gender, and reproduction! We will explore how individuals who identify with these different faiths navigate sex, gender and reproduction in their own lives, and how they adopt, adapt and/or creatively resist or reshape religious teachings and authorities. Finally, we will look at how representatives of these traditions attempt to shape law and public policy about sex, gender and reproductive practices in several countries, including the United States.
